0.0 EXECUTIVE SUMMARY	2
Age and income are key variables affecting consumers' tendency to pay for assistance	2
Consumers who are willing to pay for assistance are geographically accessible to providers	3
Concierge services are most in demand among wealthy, young male Londoners	3
Assistance with personal identity and security is seen as being very useful, but not help with household chores	3
The value placed on assistance is in inverse proportion to the frequency with which it actually happens.....	4
... although nearly a quarter of consumers think that they could never be held liable for third party damages.....	4
Assistance in the event of medical problems abroad was the largest market for pre-paid assistance in 2009.....	4
Assistance providers have many and varied opportunities.	5
... especially for computer assistance... ..	5
... while assistance with broken windows could be sold alongside home emergency or personal security cover	5
New distribution partnerships could extend the market for assistance while enhancing the partners' brands.....	5
... while a new business model could combine emergency assistance with 'home help'	6

2.0 ASSISTANCE OVERVIEW	15
Introduction	15
Consumers' attitudes to paying for assistance	16
Many demographic variables affect consumers' tendency to pay for assistance.	16
... with age and income as key ingredients.....	17
Paying in advance through assistance and insurance policies rises especially fast with income.....	18
Does this mean that 'rich pensioners' are the target segment?	19
Respondents living in city centres are the most likely to pay for assistance	20
Full-time employees are cash rich and time poor, so are prime customers for paid assistance.....	21
Young, wealthy urban men are the prime segment for concierge services	23
The types of assistance most valued by consumers	24
Personal identity and security assistance is seen as the most useful form of help	24

External legal assistance is much more important in emergencies such as accident and injury	26
The types of assistance most frequently needed by consumers	28
Although help with personal identity and security problems is valued, it is rarely needed	28
Consumers under-estimate the potential for being held liable for third party injury or damage	30
External help with household chores is not highly valued	32
A low claims frequency is implied by customers' desire to insure against uncommon risks	33
The size of the current and latent markets for assistance.....	34
Current market size	34
More consumers protect themselves against medical problems abroad than for anything else	34
Pre-paid computer assistance, personal assistance and concierge services have yet to develop fully	36
Latent market size.....	37
Three types of opportunity exist for assistance providers.....	37
... although motor breakdown and overseas health insurance are mature markets	37
Computer assistance has the greatest potential for development.....	40
Assistance with identity fraud and broken windows can develop further	40
Legal assistance has scope for development if perceptions change for third party damage	41
Business opportunities for assistance providers.....	41
Partnerships could extend the market for assistance while enhancing partners' brands	41
Full service assistance would combine emergency help with household chores	42
How consumers pay for assistance	44
Nearly a quarter of assistance is delivered through pre-paid help	44
Home and legal / tax / unemployment assistance are the largest areas for payment as needed... ..	45
... while computing assistance has the greatest potential for shifting from unpaid to paid help	45
Packaged assistance is only developed for health / travel insurance and identity fraud	45
